A word from the Chief Editor

Dear Colleagues,

Welcome to the sixth yearly issue of “International Journal of Pedagogy, Innovation and New Technologies” for 2017. This is our yearly post conference edition, and I want to draw your attention to very interesting articles concerned with the use of modern technologies for web-based distance learning, followed by a new theory on learning from a negative student feedback.

The consecutive section of this issue is dedicated to the significant socio-educational subject of social and educational inclusion for students with the disabilities. The authors discuss an extensive review of the literature and the intervention is clearly based on or influenced by the research findings that they discuss and especially the use of i-Lab in special pedagogy teaching, inclusion of modern technologies to aid the emancipation of people with disabilities, information competence, formation of future teachers of the visually impaired, working with children with speech development issues, the preparation of specialists to work with families of children with SEN (Special Educational Needs), the training of psychologists for correctional education, good practice in working with children with delay in their speech development and the building of symbolic knowledge amongst children with SEN.

The last section of our journal concludes with interesting articles discussing the Concepts of mathematical knowledge amongst children with moderate and severe SEN; Alcohol consumption amongst Polish and Ukrainian students; and The pedagogical aspects of theatre as a tool of social activism presented by scholars from Nigeria.

At the heart of our journal lies social inclusion represented by the diversity of contributing authors their respective languages and topics on special pedagogy, innovation and new technologies.

I would like to take this opportunity to express my sincere gratitude to the community spirit amongst our growing number of contributors, reviewers, recipients and followers. I trust that we are able to create an open space for vibrant discussion and that you find selection of our papers interesting and very much so engaging.

With best wishes,
Professor Maciej Tanaś
Editor in Chief
