

The Sacred Scents

Examining the Connection Between the ‘ntjw and sft in the Context of the Early Eighteenth Dynasty Temples

KATARZYNA KAPIEC

Abstract: On the inner north wall of the Southern Room of Amun in the Temple of Hatshepsut at Deir el-Bahari there is a depiction of the so-called frieze of objects, arranged in two rows. In the upper one vessels with oils containing four out of the so-called seven sacred oils and ‘ntjw’ were located. It can be observed that in the sequence of the oils from the ‘seven sacred oils’, the third one – sft – has been replaced by ‘ntjw’ and the two last oils are not depicted at all. In this paper the possible reasons for such a replacement as well as the role of both aromatic substances in the temple ritual in the early Eighteenth Dynasty are examined.

Keywords: ‘ntjw, sft’, ‘seven sacred oils’, Southern Room of Amun, Temple of Hatshepsut, Deir el-Bahari, early Eighteenth Dynasty, temple ritual

The starting point for this paper is the decoration of the Southern Room of Amun in the Temple of Hatshepsut at Deir el-Bahari (Fig. 1), and the oils depicted there in the so-called frieze of objects (Fig. 2). The following scenes have been represented on the walls of this room: offerings of oils performed by Hatshepsut for Amun-Kamutef (west and east walls),¹ offerings of two different kinds of linen performed by Hatshepsut and Thutmose III for Amun-Re (double scene on the south wall)² and scene of embracing Hatshepsut and Amunet on the east side of the north inner wall.³ The scene that is the subject of this paper is located on the same wall, just above the lintel. It is arranged in two rows. In the upper one there are vases with oils, grouped in three. In the second row there are five chests with sloping lids containing various kinds of linen. An inscription labelling the content of the vases and chests is found next to each group of vases and each chest. In the upper row, there are four oils and ‘ntjw’. The oils represented here come from the set of the so-called seven sacred oils,⁴ which canonically consists of the following ointments: stj-hb, hknw, sft, nḥnm, twʒ.wt, hʒt.t n.t ‘š and hʒt.t n.t tḥnw. The oils represented in the Southern Room of Amun are identified as: stj-hb, hknw, tp.t n.t ‘ntjw, nḥnm and twʒ.wt. Therefore, it can be observed that in the Southern Room of Amun, the third oil – sft – from the ‘seven sacred oils’ is replaced with ‘ntjw’ and two last oils are not depicted at all. The Southern Room of Amun seems to preserve the only occurrence of this change. Sometimes ‘ntjw’ could be added to the sequence of the ‘seven sacred oils’, at the end⁵ or even in the middle of the sequence,⁶ but it could not have been exchanged with any of the oils whenever the sequence of the seven oils is mentioned. In the case under discussion from the Temple of Hatshepsut, the classical sequence of oils, invented as early as the Fifth Dynasty, is, however, disturbed.

In searching for a reason of this change, it is worth examining the ‘ntjw and sft and their role in the temple ritual in the early Eighteenth Dynasty temples. Two tables given below (Tabs 1 and 2) show occurrences of those two products in the temples dating to the reigns from Hatshepsut to Amenhotep III. Other oils depicted in the ‘frieze of objects’ in the Southern Room of Amun are briefly discussed below to present the context of the replacement.

GENERAL INFORMATION

‘ntjw, or more precisely *tp.t n.t ‘ntjw*⁷ as it is called in the aforementioned ‘frieze of objects’, is usually identified with myrrh⁸ (Lat. Commiphora)⁹ or frankincense,¹⁰ specifically as a gum-resin from the incense trees (Lat. Boswellia).¹¹ The exact identification of the substance is, however, a matter of controversy among the scholars.¹² In order to show how difficult it is to conclude in this matter, it should be mentioned that the ancient Egyptians most likely used one single term for both species or simply confused them.¹³

‘ntjw was brought to Egypt from Punt already at the beginning of Fourth Dynasty. The first attestation comes from the so-called valley temple of the Bent Pyramid of Snefru at Dahshur.¹⁴ It is also explicitly mentioned as a Puntite product on the Palermo stone.¹⁵ Although some sources describe ‘ntjw as a substance imported also from the Levantine region (the Annals of Thutmose III),¹⁶ most scholars believe that it is not a proof that these trees actually grew there, but it is rather an indication of trade routes, and the product in question could have been brought to Egypt through the Arabian Peninsula and then the Levant.¹⁷

Moreover, according to the sources from the Ptolemaic times, there were various kinds of ‘ntjw available in Egypt, at least during that period. Texts from Edfu and (upper Egyptian) Athribis enumerate fourteen of them (Manniche 1999: 27–28). It is possible that some of them were imported from the Levant to serve

From the Old Kingdom onwards this resin became a valuable product, as is evidenced in the ritual texts and decoration of temples and tombs.¹⁸

In the textual sources (e.g. the *Pyramid Texts*¹⁹ and the *Coffin Texts*²⁰) the well-known aromatic properties of 'ntjw are primarily emphasised. In the Coffin Texts there are statements such as 'my nose is full of (the scent of) 'ntjw',²¹ 'ntjw and incense, with which the gods live'.²² Another passage from the Coffin Texts reads: 'I wish I could breathe with the air full of 'ntjw'.²³ In the treasury in Karnak, 'ntjw is mentioned as a 'scent of the God's Land' (Punt).²⁴ In these references 'ntjw appears as a product which emitted a very pleasant scent. It is described as so exceptional that it was associated with the divine sphere. The divine aspect is also underlined in the origins of the 'ntjw in Punt – the God's Land. Its recalling in the funerary texts might be connected with the creation of the sacred space.²⁵ The same aspect is found in the Book of the Dead, usually in the context of anointing the dead.²⁶

In the reliefs of the early Eighteenth Dynasty temples 'ntjw is represented as an oil/ointment in the offering scenes or as a burned product in the fumigation scenes. It can be depicted in different layouts and take various forms: fresh or incense as pellets (Tab. 1: 18, 20, 30, 32, 36), as incense in censer (Tab. 1: 20, 29, 32), as oil/ointment in closed (Tab. 1: 17, 35) or open b3s-vases (Tab. 1: 12, 18, 28, 30, 36). Fresh 'ntjw occurs mainly in texts in the connection to Punt (as its source; Tab. 1: 9, 10, 13, 22). In iconography it is depicted only once in Deir el-Bahari temple, in the Southern Middle Portico, just after the sequence representing an expedition to Punt (Tab. 1: 12). The processed product, used in the temple ritual (see below), can be formed as pellets or as an oil/ointment.

Unique representations of the 'ntjw-trees are attested in the Southern Middle Portico of the Temple of Hatshepsut at Deir el-Bahari (Tab. 1: 2, 7, 8, 10, 11); it is also shown as piles of red clumps in the same portico and in the 'ntjw-treasury in Karnak, the one built by Thutmose III (Tab. 1: 11, 27).²⁷ as a replacement for the best 'ntjw from Punt. The main argument in this hypothesis is the fact that 'ntjw seems to be used quite often in a private and a temple context and the amounts brought from Punt could have been insufficient.

¹⁸ Diego Espinel 2017: 26–27, n. 82. Apart from the ritual and medicine context (see below notes 28, 29), the 'ntjw-resin was used as a perfume in unguent to be applied on the skin (Davies 1943: Pl. LXVI; Manniche 1999: 94–95).

'ntjw occurs sometimes together with other sacred oils and very often with sntr.²⁸ Apart from its well-known aromatic properties, it was also used in medicine.²⁹ Moreover, it was one of the ingredients of other oils, for instance hknw or md.t,³⁰ also popular ointments. The 'ntjw of the best quality seems to have been used mainly in temple context and its availability was restricted, probably due to the limited access to it. The importance of this product is emphasised by the existence of the already mentioned separate treasures for it built in Karnak, by Hatshepsut and Thutmose III respectively. In the inscriptions from these monuments it is specified that the purpose of the buildings was to store the 'ntjw from the God's Land, as Punt was often described.³¹

TEMPLE CONTEXT

In the Eighteenth Dynasty temples (up to the reign of Amenhotep III) 'ntjw appears in various contexts (Tab. 1). The largest source of information on the origins of that product from Punt is the Southern Middle Portico in the Temple of Hatshepsut at Deir el-Bahari (Tab. 1: 2–16).

In the ritual context, the 'ntjw appears in the sequence of libation, anointing, offering eye-paints and clothing (Tab. 1: 1, 18–20, 28–32, 34–36). It appears twice in the Ritual of Ancestors,³² which Nikolaus Tacke incorporates to the Offering Ritual.³³ The first occurrence comes from the episode 19³⁴ which is entitled ‘censing with 'ntjw’. This episode is known from the p. Turin (CGT 54041) and a scene in Ramesses III’s temple at Medinet Habu.³⁵ In the latter case,³⁶ the king and Amun-Re are represented, between them there are two stands for burning the incense and an offering table. The king holds a censer in one hand while pulling the other one towards the stand. Above the stands, there is a fragmentarily preserved text which can be read as ‘causing censing with 'ntjw’. The text refers to the act of burning 'ntjw, emphasising the purification and regeneration aspects as well as the presentation of the offerings. Tacke states that this episode separated the parts of the ritual performed in front of the temple from more sacred sections.³⁷ After burning the 'ntjw the sacred atmosphere was created to enable the connection with the divine sphere. This fact corresponds to the emphasis of the 'ntjw-fragrance in other textual sources (see above). Moreover, the text refers to the mythological inundation of the Nile, which corresponds to the association of Hathor with 'ntjw. Hathor is described in the texts as the ‘Lady of 'ntjw’ and she appears in the myth of the Return of the Distant One linked with the inundation.³⁸ In another version of this myth,³⁹ the content of the b3s-vases is recalled. It is connected with the efflux of the goddess (Bastet in this case), giving the protection to the king when applied on his skin. According to the interpretation of Jens Blach Jorgensen,⁴⁰ this might be treated as a counterweight for the negative influence of menstrual blood, having a calming effect on the goddess. The purity obtained by the anointing might emphasise this connection. As mentioned above, ‘ntjw as an oil or ointment was always depicted in the b3s-vases. Following this interpretation, the red colour of ‘ntjw clumps may be connected with blood as well. Furthermore, ‘ntjw was associated with cult of other goddesses – Mut and Tefnut (see Tab. 1: 36–38), who appear in the same myth.

In the Ritual of Ancestors, ‘ntjw appears for the second time in episode 24, known from p. Turin (CGT 54041) and p. Chester Beatty IX (BM 10689).⁴¹ This episode is the penultimate section of the presentation of the food offerings and concerns burning the ‘ntjw. The text once again refers to the regeneration aspects of the substance in question.

‘ntjw was usually offered by the king to the gods,⁴² but there is one example, where the god ensures the king that he would provide him with ‘ntjw (see Tab. 1: 31).

• Sft

GENERAL INFORMATION

The first attestation of this product dates back to the Second Dynasty, or more precisely to the reign of Khasekhemui.⁴³ Since then, sft appears frequently, mainly in tomb contexts due to its occurrence in the offering list. This oil was identified as a product made from the ‘ś-tree resin (probably Lat. Cilicica Abies),⁴⁴ imported from the eastern coast of the Mediterranean Sea.⁴⁵ The term sft was also used to designate the resin alone.⁴⁶ The name of the product does not have any specific meaning.

Textual sources underline the healing⁴⁷ and aromatic properties of this substance.⁴⁸ Moreover, the sft-oil is attested in funerary rituals, as an oil essential in the hereafter.⁴⁹ As one of the ‘seven sacred oils’, sft appears in the sequences where these oils are mentioned, for instance in the Pyramid Texts.⁵⁰ It is attested in a similar context in the Coffin Texts.⁵¹ Worth noting is that in spell 845 (CT VII, 49a-e) sft is mentioned together with the md.t-oil, the one which demanded ‘njw as one of its ingredients.⁵²

Sft, as a resin as well as an oil, was used in the mummification process. In the form of the resin it was applied as reinforcement, an adhesive. When mentioned in the ritual texts as an oil, its aromatic properties are underlined. Burning resin in the place of an incense was also practiced during the funerary rites.⁵³

In the iconography, sft appears usually in the funerary context: in the processional scenes with offering bearers who are carrying the tomb endowment⁵⁴ or in a group of offerings needed for the deceased. In the latter case it could be depicted in various ways: on the walls of the burial chamber,⁵⁵ beside the false doors,⁵⁶ or in the so-called friezes of objects (late Old Kingdom and Middle Kingdom).⁵⁷ In the temple context, it is depicted in the sequence of the ‘seven sacred oils’.⁵⁸ Usually it is represented as being inside the hn̄m-vase – the one with a long neck and vertical handle. This remark concerns the general manner of depicting this oil. It is different for the early Eighteenth Dynasty temples’ context as it can be observed in Tab. 2. At that time sft was mainly represented in the bȝs-vases, open or closed. The accompanying inscription provides the information about the content of the vessel.⁵⁹

There is no direct depiction of sft without a vase showing the product itself. It can only be assumed that it could have been delivered in red-brownish clumps as the gum of the ſ-tree, which is represented in the tomb of Rekhmira (TT 100), in the scene of presenting the tribute from Syria.⁶⁰

The existence of the sft is also attested among the burial equipment. There are a number of travertine vases still containing traces of oil or resin, some of them in this particular form in which sft was usually represented. The significant role of the ‘seven sacred oils’ in the funerary sphere is also emphasised by the common finds of slabs for these products among the tomb equipment.⁶¹

As the sft is one of the ‘seven sacred oils’, it is sometimes difficult to separate it and define its own properties. These oils were mentioned together as an essential group of products used during the rituals.

EARLY EIGHTEENTH DYNASTY TEMPLE CONTEXT

While Harold H. Nelson stated that the ‘scenes depicting the use of myrrh are unusual’,⁶² the occurrences of sft in the temple context are far more uncommon (see Tab. 2). Sft is never depicted outside of the context of the ‘seven sacred oils’; even if the list is incomplete, it never appears alone, always in the sequence of at least three products (Tab. 2: 1, 3–6). It does not play its own role in the temple ritual, but it is treated collectively with other oils. In the early Eighteenth Dynasty temple context, sft appears mostly together with other oils as an accompanying oil placed on the offering table in the main scene of offering of md.t (Tab. 2: 3–6). An unique representation of the offering of the seven oils, including sft, is attested in the Chapel of Hatshepsut in the temple at Deir el-Bahari in the procession of the offering bearers (Tab. 2: 1), that was inspired by the decoration of the offering rooms of the Old Kingdom pyramid temples and private tombs.⁶³

• Stj-hb

This oil is for the first time attested by the end of the Third Dynasty⁶⁴ and was in use until Ptolemaic times.⁶⁵ The meaning of its name is ‘the scent of the festival’.⁶⁶ According to the sources from the Edfu temple, it was made as a mixture of different seeds, frankincense and flowers.⁶⁷ In the Pyramid Texts, stj-hb together with the md.t-oil are mentioned in the context of healing the eye of Horus.⁶⁸ In the Coffin Texts it appears in a similar context,⁶⁹ as well as in the Book of the Dead.⁷⁰ On the west wall of the Southern Room of Amun, there is an offering scene, where originally Hatshepsut was presenting stj-hb and hkñw to Amun-Kamutef.⁷¹ Similar offering scenes, where stj-hb and other oils from the ‘seven sacred oils’ are presented to Amun, are attested in the treasury of ‘ntjw in Karnak⁷² and in the Luxor temple (Tab. 2: 3–6).⁷³

• Hknw

Hknw was one of the most popular oils in ancient Egypt throughout. It is known since the Predynastic times, being attested the whole dynastic period up to the Coptic times. In the self-presentation of Herkhuf (Sixth Dynasty) it is described as a natural product brought from foreign lands.⁷⁴ Peter Kaplony and Kurt Sethe argued that the name of this oil is connected with the verb ‘to praise’.⁷⁵ Hknw is mentioned in the Pyramid Texts,⁷⁶ the *Coffin Texts*⁷⁷ and the Book of the Dead.⁷⁸ It was also used in the medicine.⁷⁹ A detailed recipe carved on the wall of one of the rooms in the temple of Edfu reveals that hknw was made of ‘ntjw’, the so-called ‘b-resin, identified as styrax, and acacia seeds.⁸⁰ It was an universal oil, very popular, often mentioned not only together with the ‘seven sacred oils’ but also with many others (Tab. 2: 3–6).⁸¹

• Nhnm

The nhnm-oil is attested for the first time in the Fifth Dynasty.⁸² The meaning of its name is ‘reunion’.⁸³ According to the recent chemical analyses of the content of the Middle Kingdom’s alabaster pot with the inscription of this oil’s name on the vessel’s cover, this product might have been made of the pine resin.⁸⁴ In the Ptolemaic sources nhnm is described as an oil made of wood pitch, pine and bitumen.⁸⁵ Apart from the attestations in the *Pyramid Texts*⁸⁶ and the Coffin Texts,⁸⁷ it was used in the mummification process.⁸⁸ Nhnm almost always appears in the connection with the ‘seven sacred oils’ (Tab. 2: 4–6) and seems to have had no separate use.

⁸³ It is worth noting that in the name of the oil there is a sign of a jar (type D according to Jéquier 1921: 144), which can be read as hn̄m (G W9, TLA: lemma no.123410), and this oil is represented here in the Southern Room of Amun in this very kind of vessel. It is not a rule though as it could be depicted in other types of vessels as well. For instance, in the Chapel of Hatshepsut in the same temple this oil is represented in a globular jar (Naville 1901: Pl. CIX).

- Twʒ.wt

Twʒ.wt is the last oil depicted in the so-called frieze of objects in the Southern Room of Amun. For the first time it is attested in the Fifth Dynasty, being already incorporated in the set of the ‘seven sacred oils’.⁸⁹ Its name means ‘support, assistance’.⁹⁰ According to the late Ptolemaic sources, it was made of the wood pitch, frankincense and pine.⁹¹ Twʒ.wt is mentioned in the *Pyramid Texts*⁹² as well as in the Coffin Texts.⁹³ Just as the nhnm-oil, it is almost always attested in the connection with the ‘seven sacred oils’ (Tab. 2: 4–6) and seems to have had no separate use.

CHANGE IN THE SEQUENCE OF OILS

After examining ‘ntjw, sft, and other oils from the ‘frieze of objects’ in the Southern Room of Amun, it can be observed that there are many physical similarities between ‘ntjw and sft'. As the fragrant resins, if we consider sft as a resin and not as an oil or ointment, they played similar role in the rituals as burned incense and both could be used in the mummification process. Both products have been depicted in red-brownish colour and in similar shape,⁹⁴ were often used in medicine, and had special aromatic properties, emphasised in texts. Even more significant is that Dioscorides compared fir resin (identified with sft, Lat. Cilicica Abies) to frankincense, stating that their scents were similar.⁹⁵

There are, however, some differences between these two products, which actually can be helpful in explaining the exchange between them in the Southern Room of Amun. The most significant difference is that the sft-oil was a more common, more available and more widely used product, for example, in medicine or as an ingredient of cosmetics. It appears frequently in the funeral sphere, not only as an essential oil for the deceased in the hereafter, but also as one of the substances used in the mummification process. In temple ritual, it appears very rarely and only in the context of the ‘seven sacred oils’. ‘ntjw, especially the one from Punt, was more valuable, possibly because of the limited accessibility. The great significance of the Punt expeditions was always emphasised by the rulers and their officials who took part in them.⁹⁶ Moreover, ‘ntjw seems to be far more connected with the temple context due to its incorporation to the Ritual of Ancestors, where regeneration and rebirth aspects are highlighted in the text and through the association with the repeated inundation.

⁹² PT 76, § 51c.

⁹³ CT VII, 134j, 138e.

⁹⁴ This may imply solar connotations, what is also expressed in the texts where the sun is portrayed as the power which makes resins soft and releasing fragrance (Raven 1990: 16).

⁹⁵ On Medical Matters: I, 92.

⁹⁶ Davies 1961: 19–23, Pl. 4; Zivie 1984: 245–522; Bács 2015: 16, Fig. 10.

From all five oils displayed in the ‘frieze of objects’, sft was the most suitable to be replaced with ntjw – these two products were the most similar to each other, both were known in form of resins while other products were oils or ointments, and, moreover, their properties were similar. If the aim of the person responsible for the design of the decoration of this room was to stress the significance of ntjw, the choice of replacing sft was the most reasonable. This exchange seems to have been intentional. When there was a task to put ntjw in this frieze of objects instead of one of the sacred oils, the most similar product was chosen to be exchanged with it.

As mentioned above, depictions of ntjw are quite rare and when one takes into consideration the fact that more than a half of the attestations of ntjw in Karnak is dated to the reign of Hatshepsut and Thutmose III,⁹⁷ the significance of this product during that time becomes clear. Incorporating ntjw to the most precious oils in the sequence represented in the Southern Room of Amun was another way to underline its role in temple context and its high value for Hatshepsut, already expressed in the decoration of the Punt Portico in the Temple of Hatshepsut and in the treasury in Karnak.

Acknowledgements

The research project aiming at studying the Southern Room of Amun in the Temple of Hatshepsut at Deir el-Bahari is financed by National Science Centre, Poland, granted on the basis of the decision no. 2015/19/N/HS3/02153. I would like to express my gratitude to Prof. Ewa Laskowska-Kusztal, Dr. Jadwiga Iwaszczuk and Dr. Anastasia Stupko-Lubczyńska for reading the draft and their valuable comments. I would like to thank Dr. Zbigniew E. Szafrański for giving me the opportunity to work in the Southern Room of Amun in the Temple of Hatshepsut at Deir el-Bahari. I also thank Dr. Filip Taterka for correcting my English.
